

According to the US Bureau of Labor Statistics, and a bevy of industrial, corporate and independent studies regarding the American workforce, it's clearly evident poor lighting is one of the most critical factors affecting employee productivity.

Bruskin Goldring Research surveyed knowledge workers in the US, revealing that as many as 85% of respondents stated that they suffered from headaches as a result of poor lighting at the workplace.

The survey also revealed that the majority of respondents polled believe improved lighting in the workplace would improve mood and increase energy levels in the workplace, directly affecting their productivity.

With such a large percentage of the biggest workforce in the world complaining about how poor lighting is affecting performance, the situation clearly demands that business executives sit up and take notice.
